Q9*Somewhat

Do you believe the proposed changes will help reduce barriers to registration for suitably trained overseas practitioners?

Q10

Please tell us why:

The biggest issue of registering in NZ as an overseas dentist is going through the NDEB. The notoriously difficult, bureaucratic, high cost, multi year long process just to register as a dentist. Atleast the UK understands how bad the ORE examinations and process is right now and they are actively making changes to it to double the number of registered dentists by next year, removing red tape as they say. Dental councils do not understand the toll it takes to go through this process. These new changes are atleast a step in the right direction in terms of thinking however more countries need to be in the recognized qualifications list. How is it that Portugal is on the list and the UAE is not. NZ council must realize all the NDEB exams must be done in Canada. Instead of relying on NDEB, NZ should have their own way of assessment. Why would an experienced dentist go through this headache and multiple year long process of the NDEB. I know multiple dentists drop out after 5 years of trying to pass these exams. In their words it's a 'money making machine'.

Limited recognition pathways for non-Australian, non-New Zealand graduates

At present, only a few options exist for foreign-trained dentists: either completing an approved NZ/Australian dental degree, passing the New Zealand Registration Examination (NZREX equivalent, via ADC route), or holding an NDEB Canada certificate.

For dentists like myself from universities in the UAE or Asia, this forces us to go through another country's licensing system (Canada's NDEB), which involves significant extra cost, time, and uncertainty even though the professional competence standard is equivalent.

Lack of direct assessment or reciprocity

There is no direct route for competent overseas dentists (who have already completed rigorous training, internships, and active clinical work abroad) to demonstrate clinical competence directly in New Zealand.

Other countries (like the UK under provisional registration proposals, or Australia under the ADC streamlined assessment pilot) are developing more flexible models, whereas New Zealand's route remains rigidly tied to third-party exams (NDEB or ADC).

Financial and logistical barriers of the NDEB route

Sitting NDEB exams requires travel to Canada, multiple attempts (ACJ, ACS, AFK), expensive fees, and long waiting times.

For international dentists not intending to practise in Canada, it creates double expense first passing NDEB, then applying again for New Zealand registration.

There is no local or remote option for sitting those exams under DCNZ oversight.

Unclear policy on recency of practice and internship equivalence

Many non-NZ dentists complete a 1-year clinical internship (as in the UAE). It's unclear whether this is considered equivalent to the "supervised practice" requirement or how recent practice (e.g., within 2 years) affects recognition.

Clearer guidance or case examples for foreign graduates would help applicants plan their career pathways earlier. Potential for a provisional or supervised registration model

Many other jurisdictions are exploring provisional registration for overseas dentists to work under supervision while completing assessments.

Is DCNZ considering introducing a similar pathway to attract competent international dentists sooner particularly given the dentist shortages in certain regions of New Zealand?

Is there any additional feedback you would like to share on the consultation?

Council needs to do more and cut red tape preventing hundreds of dentists to even consider practicing and settling in NZ. They should also look into proposed changes the UK is making to reform the ORE exams, mutual recognition and shortening the time overseas dentists join the workforce.
